Excerpt: . . . ranges, and firing straight ahead, the aim would be better. Men do become splendid shots with a revolver at speed on horseback. Colonel Gilmor could gallop along a road full speed, and put a bullet into every telegraph pole he passed. Gustavus Adolphus ordered his cavalry to ride up towards infantry, discharge their pistols, draw swords, and ride in sword in hand. If that worked well in his day, why should not the revolver work ten times better now It will carry four times the distance, will go straighter, and six shots can be fired with the greatest rapidity. It said that it was in the hand-to-hand fight that Gustavus Adolphus wished his cavalry to be famous; he wished them to depend mainly on the shock of the charge and the keen edge of the sabre; yet he (i not disdain to get all the advantage possible from his old-fashioned horsepistols. Why then should we be too proud to use that magnificent pistol the revolver The cavalry in the Confederate war for independence often charged infantry with the pistol and with great success. We quote an account from Gilmors Four Years in the Saddle: I ordered my men to draw pistols and prepare to charge. As we started out at a trot we received a wild volley without much damage, though it was of buckshot and ball. Only myself and another were struck, and not till after the battle did I discover...
