The dip is less constant in these rocks, and their relation to the crystalline schists of the snowy range is not well defined. Where we next get a section of the lower Himalaya, through the Nepal , , . valley, there is little outward resemblance to what we have The Nepal section. seen to the west. The Choria Ghati range, between the plains and the Etounra Dun, is a pattern specimen of the Siwalik type. North of the Dun there is an equally characteristic representative of the Nahan range flanking the mountains. But inside this we no longer find the border mountain-range of slaty rooks capped by plain blue limestone, that is so constant to the west of the Kali. We come at once upon schistose rocks. These, however, are not mica schists of the ordinary type, such as those north of Naiai Tal. First, there are earthy (slaty) schists, some quite black and with carbonaceous layers; then flaggy quartzose schists, passing up into strong schistose quartzites; and these are succeeded by a great mass of dense highly crystalline white limestone, within three miles from the Nahan boundary. All are more or less vertical and folded with a prevailing northerly underlie, the strike being 15 south of east. Beyond this steep ascending section there is a broad band of still greater disturbance,...
